

Women and the Arab revolutions

Voices from the frontlines of struggle

www.menasolidaritynetwork.com/women2014

Picture: Anti-sexual harassment march, February 2013, Egypt – by Gigi Ibrahim

Millions of women across the Arab world have taken part in street protests and strikes over the past three years. They have led marches to claim their constitutional rights, organised sit-ins to win better pay and conditions, faced down armed police and organised to challenge sexual harassers in the streets.

MENA Solidarity Network is compiling a collection of interviews and articles from women activists across the Arab world. It will explore the relationship between women's fight for liberation from oppression and their role in leading struggles from below for social and political change. We will be asking women from Yemen, Morocco, Egypt, Lebanon, Bahrain, Syria and Tunisia to share their experiences of revolution with us.

We need your help to compile questions and ideas for our interviews.

Please send us your suggestions via our website here:
www.menasolidaritynetwork.com/women2014

Help us spread the word about the project by circulating the information about the project through your trade union or organisation.

MENA Solidarity Network organises campaigns in solidarity with the struggle for social justice and democracy in the Arab world. We are a network of trade unionists in the UK supported by three national trade unions, UCU, NUT and PCS, as well as numerous local trade union branches and Trades Councils. Find out more online at www.menasolidaritynetwork.com